HUMANITARIAN CONCERN

CHURCH HEAD URGES TO END DRUG KILLINGS

It's a waste of human lives, says Philippine cardinal

MANILA

THE head of the Philippines' powerful Catholic church yesterday called for an end to the "waste of human lives" following a brutal week in President Rodrigo Duterte's drug war in which a boy, 17, was among dozens killed.

Authorities said police raids dubbed "One Time Big Time" saw at least 76 people shot dead, as rights groups and lawmakers condemned the operation as an alarming "killing spree" in Duterte's flagship campaign.

Yesterday, the highest-ranking church official in the predominantly Catholic nation expressed concern about the increase in the number of deaths.

"We knock on the consciences of those who kill even the helpless, especially those who cover their faces with bonnets, to stop wasting human lives," Cardinal Luis Tagle said in Sunday Masses here.

"The illegal drug problem should not be reduced to a political or criminal issue.

"It is a humanitarian concern that affects all of us."

Duterte, 72, launched an unprecedented crackdown on illegal narcotics after winning the presidency last year on a promise to kill tens of thousands of criminals.

The church, one of the nation's oldest and most influential institutions, had been among the few voices denouncing the deaths as polls showed Duterte continued to enjoy widespread popularity.

During the 14-months Duterte has been in power, police have confirmed killing more than 3,500 people, insisting they acted in self-defence.

According to police data, more than 2,000 other people have been killed in drug-related crimes and thousands more murdered in unexplained circumstances.

The numbers saw a sudden increase this week, with Duterte praising officers who shot dead 32 people in a single province as he urged for more.

At least 44 people were killed in various cities, including a 17-year-old boy whose death on Thursday sparked a national furor.

Relatives of Kian Delos Santos released a closed-circuit television camera footage of the boy being dragged away by two officers, as they questioned a police report that he shot at them first.

Tagle called for nine days of prayer for people who died in the drug war.

"Those with sorrowful hearts and awakened consciences may come to your pastors to tell your stories, and we will document them for the wider society."

The church has been a central figure in some of Philippines' most tumultuous political events, including the 1986 "People Power" revolution that overthrew dictator Ferdinand Marcos.

It had initially declined to criticise Duterte's drug war, but as the death toll of mostly poor people mounted, it began a campaign to stop the killings last year.

Church groups have also sheltered witnesses, and provided financial and emotional support to families of those slain.

In response, Duterte launched a broadside against priests and bishops whom he accused of "hypocrisy".

Yesterday, the president of the Catholic Bishops' Conference of the Philippines joined Tagle in denouncing the deaths, calling on the faithful to ring church bells daily in solidarity with the victims.

"The sound of the bells is a wake-up call for a nation that no longer knows how to condole with the bereaved, that is cowardly to call out evil. The sound of the bells is a call to stop consenting to the killings!" Archbishop Socrates Villegas said.

Duterte's spokesman had said the government would investigate the deaths, but added that the president would "vigorously pursue" his drug war. AFP
